City of the Sharp-Nosed Fish. Oxyrhynchus, the city dedicated to the eponymous fish of Peter Parsons' book, is in some ways the Tutankhamun's tomb of papyrology. It was quite an ordinary place, but it happens to have preserved treasures beyond expectation. Here, the treasures are texts written on papyrus, mainly in Greek and from the period of Roman rule over Egypt.

Oxyrhynchus - Wikipedia

A fascinating glimpse into the lives of Greeks living in Egypt in the Roman period (1st - 5th centuries AD). The evidence is provided by scraps of papyrus - letters, documents and literature - preserved in the the famous rubbish tip of Oxyrhynchus, the 'city of the sharp-nosed fish'. Here's one of my favourite samples:

City of the Sharp-Nosed Fish is a book for those willing to be swept along by the sheer profusion of sometimes curious observations about a city in Roman Egypt and by the humane and often witty retelling of the triumphs and misfortunes of some of its inhabitants. Those in search of 'something less anecdotal' are advised from the outset to look elsewhere.
